

I am vehemently opposed to any attempt to weaken the Indiana State law that protects me from the constant barrage of tele-marketing calls that were ever present before the law was enacted. I know that the FCC is currently bent on protecting the public from offensive broadcasting on the radio and to a lesser degree on television. I personally find these tele-marketers a much more significant problem. I have the power to turn my radio or TV off if I don't like the programming; if you grant the request of the Consumer Banking Association I have no power to prevent them from invading my home every day throughout the evening hours. This is a genuine opportunity for the FCC to protect the american public from a real nuisance

Thank you.
